

Yes, flowers can often be delivered to an overseas recipient at work if the workplace accepts personal deliveries and a local florist can serve the address. Delivery during a particular shift is not always guaranteed, so check the available time options before ordering.

Check the workplace first

Some offices accept flowers at reception, while others restrict personal deliveries or require them to be collected from a mailroom. Hospitals, factories, secure buildings and shared offices may have rules that prevent a courier from reaching the recipient directly.

Ask the recipient or someone familiar with the workplace about its delivery policy. If the flowers are a surprise, a colleague may be able to confirm the address and receiving arrangements without revealing the gift.

Make sure the recipient will be working on the chosen date. Local holidays, different working weeks, leave and remote work can all affect whether someone is there to receive flowers.

Arrange the delivery

Use the workplace address as it is written locally, including the postal code and any building or floor details. The recipient's full name and a contact number can help the courier or reception staff identify the right person.

1. Check the date and working hours in the recipient's local time zone.
2. Confirm that the workplace accepts flower deliveries and find out where couriers should leave them.
3. Enter the full address, recipient's name, contact number and any permitted delivery instructions.
4. Check the delivery date and available time window before placing the order.

5. Keep the order confirmation so you can refer to the delivery details if a problem arises.

A delivery instruction might say to leave the flowers with reception, if that is allowed. Avoid adding private access codes or other sensitive workplace information unless the delivery service specifically requires them and the workplace permits it.

Allow for timing and handover

Use the recipient's local date when choosing delivery. An order placed in one country can fall on a different calendar day in another, especially across distant time zones.

Some delivery services offer a time window, while others provide only a date. Even with a requested window, traffic, local delivery routes or building access can affect arrival. Check the terms before ordering if the recipient works a short shift or leaves at a fixed time.

If reception accepts the flowers, they may not reach the recipient immediately. Choose an arrangement that can sit safely at a desk or collection point, and check that there is room for it. A home delivery may be more practical if the workplace cannot receive gifts or the recipient is rarely there.

Common questions

Can I request delivery before the recipient leaves?

You can request it if the service accepts timing instructions, but a request is not necessarily a guarantee. Check the available window and delivery terms before ordering.

What happens if the recipient is away from their desk?

The courier may leave the flowers with an authorized reception or mailroom, depending on workplace policy and the delivery service's rules. The recipient may need to collect them.

Can flowers be delivered without a phone number?

Requirements vary by service and destination. If a number is required, provide one that can help the courier reach the recipient or the workplace.

Keep reading: time zones and gift delivery