These digital products do not alter gameplay; instead, they serve as cosmetic enhancements. In time, these skins obtained real-world financial value identified by supply, demand, wear condition, and rarity.

Due to the fact that these skins can be traded between accounts, a secondary market emerged. Third-party websites quickly capitalized on this by enabling gamers to deposit their digital skins in exchange for site currency, which might then be utilized to play numerous casino-style video games.

A provably fair system enables players to independently validate that the outcome of every video game round was truly random and was not manipulated by the platform. This is normally accomplished using cryptographic hashing (integrating a server seed, a client seed, and a nonce). Before a round starts, the gamer receives a hashed version of the server seed.
